LOCK-OUT UNLAWFUL UNDER LABOUR RELATIONS LEGISLATION IN ONTARIO

1. Statutory Background

Authority to declare that a strike or lockout is unlawful, as distinct from the granting of consent to the institution of a prosecution against a person calling or authorizing or engaging in an unlawful strike, is vested in the Board by The Labour Relations Act, 1950. The relevant sections were amended in 1954 and now read as follows:-

> 59. Where a trade union or a council of trade unions calls or authorizes a strike or employees engage in a strike which the employer or employers' organization concerned alleges is unlawful, the employer or employers' organization may apply to the Board for a declaration that the strike is unlawful and the Board may make such a declaration.
> 60. Where an employer or employers' organization calls or authorizes a lock-out which any of the employees or the trade union or the council of trade unions concerned alleges is unlawful, any of the employees or the trade union or the council of trade unions may apply to the Board for a declaration that the lock-out is unlawful and the Board may make such a declaration.

2. Procedure and Policy

Applications under sections 59 and 60 of the Act, where the work interruption is in progress at the time of the filing of the application, are now listed for hearing within as short a time as possible after the date of the filing of the application. The time for filing a reply is abridged under the Board's power to abridge times prescribed by the Rules where it is deemed necessary or convenient in the public interest. Hearings of all applications of the types under discussion, as is the case with all charges of unfair practices, are formal - witnesses are sworn and subject to cross-examination. The policy of the Board in dealing with such applications is set out in the Board's decision in the Ball Brothers Case, (1957) C.C.H. Canadian Labour Law Reporter ¶16091:

> ..... It is our considered opinion that the Legislature has vested in the Board a discretion as to whether a declaration under section 59 should or should not be made. In other words, the Legislature recognized that there might be cases in which, although a strike or a lockout is unlawful, the Board may refrain from issuing a declaration to that effect. In the exercise of this discretion, the Board has generally held that a declaration should not be issued in cases in which the strike has been settled before the application comes on for hearing. In order to effectuate the purpose which section 59 was designed to serve, the Board, acting under Rule 19(3), has adopted the practice of abridging the time for filing a reply to such applications and it has also abridged the time that normally elapses under the Rules before a case is heard. By adopting this procedure, the Board has been able to deal with such applications within a few days of the filing of the application.
> There are in our opinion several situations in which a declaration under section 59 might well be issued even though the application comes on for hearing after the strike has been settled: (i) where a union has called a number of unlawful strikes as part of a general pattern for gaining its objectives in defiance of the law; (ii) where, although the particular unlawful strike which provided the occasion for an application has been settled, the employer affected thereby has a reasonable fear that his operations will again be interrupted in similar fashion...
> It may not be amiss to point out that the principles applicable to section 59 would also be applicable to the exercise of the Board's discretion under section 60 which confers upon the Board authority to issue a declaration that a lockout is unlawful.....

Statistical Analysis

Table 1 shows the administrative load of the Board in respect of applications for a declaration that a strike or lockout is unlawful, and Table 2 provides information on some aspects of time lapse in such applications.
